THE CHALLENGE

A disused playground in the Moses Green area of Bolton was becoming increasingly derelict and attracting large groups of youths to gather and cause a nuisance. The original equipment had to be removed some years earlier due to vandalism and misuse, and younger children were left with nowhere to play. Residents wanted a colourful area that would deter youths from hanging around and provide a safe environment for children to play together outdoors, whilst also brightening up the otherwise grey and drab surroundings.

OUR SOLUTION

Contractor Bolton WISE appointed artist Kay Aplin to design a new low level playground themed around the children's story 'The Very Hungry Caterpillar'. Kay approached Tarmac to supply the coloured surfacing options that could be used creatively to complement her designs. After advising her on possible colour combinations, ULTICOLOUR was specified for its vibrant colours as well as its durable nature. It was used in colours to create a clearly marked out play area to define the space and create a striking look, which would appeal to children. We supplied 12 tonnes of ULTICOLOUR in four different colours, which was laid by an accredited sub-contractor, James Callaghan Sons and Co. Ltd.

RESULTS AND BENEFITS

As well as helping to liven up the area, ULTICOLOUR provided the added benefits of being hard wearing, durable and quick and simple to install.
